To the Class of Ninety-five

The stock-brokers, life-insurance agents and industrial promoters of the class may use this book in their business. And that ill-assorted remnant—our dwindling company of bachelors—may make it serve when sounding forth the calls to their respective marriage feasts. But it is not a book for any sensible man to read.

Scattered through its pages are some pictures of Princeton's newer buildings. As a physical plant, the College has doubled in size during the fifteen years since we were launched upon an expectant world. Princeton's material and architectural progress is but the outward sign of her intellectual and scholarly awakening. In these things we have pride; perhaps also a sense of relief that we were permitted to graduate before the advent of rigid requirements.

Some snap-shots of the Class Reunion have been added. As a frontispiece you will recognize the D. Q. Brown Long Distance Cup, won fairly by Ray Carter who left his work in the Punjab Province of India to travel half-way round the world and spend a week in Princeton with the Class of Ninety-Five.

I had it in mind to reproduce the Reunion—to re-create its atmosphere by printing the speeches in the tent—to describe the friendly foolishness that made memorable those five days in June. But I confess that the task is beyond me. Nor am I sure that you would care to have your own impressions of the Reunion rudely shattered by the intrusion of mine.

Compiling a mass of statistics, like this, is the acme of dullness. Yet I have enjoyed enormously the privilege you have given me of prying into your private affairs; of pursuing you relentlessly from year to year, from skyscraper to skyscraper, from apartment-house to suburban villa and back again. The business of Class Secretary, when reduced to a system, and conducted with cheerfulness, is altogether the most satisfying by-product of a college education.

A. C. I.

Geographical Distribution in 1910

*Note:—An asterisk (*) following a name indicates that the "permanent address" is not the same as the place of business or present residence. In such cases refer to the detailed information printed in the body of the Record.*

The Class Secretary believes that the following table will prove especially interesting to the members of the class when traveling, for it makes it possible to determine quickly the names of the '95 men in each city and town.
